Just as you would have to practice basketball to be a better player, you also have to practice listening to be a better student. How can you listen in school? Here are some suggestions.

One of the things you need to do is to make sure that your mind doesn't wander. It's easy to start thinking about other things, especially when you're not interested in the subject. So make yourself pay attention to what the teacher is saying.

Next, listen for the main ideas. If you want to catch every piece of information, you'll feel tired and bored. You'll also need to look at the teacher. Not only does this show respect to the teacher, but it also helps stop your mind from wandering. A friend may try to pass you a note. Or it could just be someone talking to his deskmate. It can even be a group of people who are talking loudly as they pass the door.

Finally, you need to take notes because you cannot remember everything the teacher says. Taking notes also makes you pay attention to the class.

Listening isn't always easy. But if you follow the steps, you'll be more successful in your classes.

17.To listen better in school, you should stop your mind from starting to _____.

18.You should listen for the main _____ when the teacher is speaking.

19.Looking at the teacher shows _____ and helps keep your mind focused.

20._____ notes helps you remember what the teacher says.

21.If you follow the steps, you'll be more _____ in your classes.

Passage 2

If you put your history notes under your pillow and sleep on them the night before an exam, will you do any better in the exam? Most of us have hoped this may help. However, knowledge can't go through the pillow into your brain. But that doesn't mean you can't learn while you are asleep.

Scientists aren't exactly sure how it works, but they have discovered that the brain can learn things during sleeping hours. In one experiment, researchers gave German speakers some Dutch (荷兰的) words to learn. Then, they divided them into three groups. The researchers played the Dutch words for people in Group 1 while they were asleep, without telling them what they were doing. The sound was low so it didn't wake them up, and only the newly introduced words were used. Another group listened to the same words while they were awake. The researchers found the people in Group 1 were able to learn and remember the words better. This was true only for the words that were played while they slept. The third group listened to the words when they walked. The walkers didn't have the same success in remembering the words as the sleeping group.

The researchers later found that people had more slow-wave brain activities all over the night. They said that more slow waves made people have a better memory for the new words.

22.Scientists aren't exactly sure how it _____, but the brain can learn during sleep.

23.In the experiment, Group 1 listened to new words while they were _____.

24.Group 1 remembered the words _____ than those who listened while awake.

26.More slow-waves help people have a better _____ for the new words.

Part IV　Reading Comprehension（20%）

Directions:

There are 2 passages. Each passage is followed by 5 questions, including four short questions and one translation item. Please answer these five questions based on the content of the passages and write your answers on the answer lines.

Passage 1

People know animals do have feelings, but they are not sure if these feelings are correctly understood. In recent years, scientists have done research about the feelings of cows, frogs and pandas. A new study adds chickens to the list. It states that humans can judge a chicken's mood by listening to its calls.

The researchers put a bowl behind a door. Inside the bowl, sometimes, there was something chickens love to eat, such as rice or insects. Sometimes, there was nothing. When the chickens saw food behind the door, they seemed happy and produced fast and loud sounds, known as food calls. When there wasn't food, the chickens made low and long noises to express disappointment. The researchers recorded all these sounds and studied their waves.

Then the researchers chose 16 recordings of such chicken noises. Half were from the chickens seeing the food and half were from the chickens finding no food. The recordings were played to 194 volunteers. Sixty-nine percent of the volunteers correctly understood whether the chickens were feeling happy or not, and some of them even had no experience of taking care of chickens.

The result shows that humans have the natural ability to understand the feelings of chickens. Hopefully, this finding can bring about new technology to help with chicken-raising, a big industry in many countries. Some scientists are already working on a smart computer program that can identify chickens' feelings. This is good news for farmers who want to make the birds happier and healthier.

27.What animal does the new study add to the list?

_____

28.What kind of sounds did the chickens make when they saw food behind the door?

_____

29.Did most of the volunteers understand whether the chickens were feeling happy or not?

_____

30.What does the result of the study show about humans?

_____

31.Translate the underlined sentence "It states that humans can judge a chicken's mood by listening to its calls." into Chinese.

_____

Passage 2

Have you ever heard of Chinglish (中式英语)—a mix of English and Chinese? It is not always regarded to be wrong now like it used to be, but as a fun way to connect with others.

A popular example is a post on a Chinese website by a foreign blogger. She talked about a parting (分手). Many Chinese people expressed their ideas in English to comfort her, but their English wasn't perfect. So some words of kindness turned into "You pretty, he ugly, u swan, he frog".

Some people thought it was fine because it was fast and fun to write shorter words without changing the main meaning.

Chinglish even plays a part in The Oxford English Dictionary (《牛津英语词典》). Phrases like "add oil", meaning "jiayou" in Chinese and "cheer" in English, have already been in the dictionary. Such an act shows there have been so many people using the phrases or words that they are more and more popular.

After the 2008 Olympics in Beijing, people started to accept Chinglish more. For example, Chinese words like yaoguai are kept instead of being translated in more and more video games. And foreign players learn them happily as part of Chinese culture. Chinese people are also helping others understand their culture by explaining Chinglish words in games. This helps people around the world learn more about China.

But some people also show their worries. A teacher said that Chinglish should not be used in situations like classes or an important work meeting or discussion. It may cause misunderstanding and make others think you're impolite.

32. What is Chinglish according to the passage?

_____

33. Is Chinglish regarded as incorrect nowadays?

_____

34. Which Chinglish phrase has been included in The Oxford English Dictionary?

_____

35.When did people start to accept Chinglish more?

_____
